

Sub Report 2:
Advertising and Promotion Strategy

Let's be honest with ourselves, nobody wakes up thinking, "Wow, I can't wait to see another boring water ad today." That's exactly why Liquid Death exists: to flip the script and make something as basic as drinking water feel rebellious, fun, and downright cool. Building off what we learned in Sub Report 1, this report lays out an advertising and messaging strategy that's anything but traditional. Instead, it's designed to grab attention, make people laugh, and get them talking (and chugging) in the most unexpected ways. Liquid Death has already made a name for itself by ditching the lame, tired, overdone "refreshing mountain spring" aesthetic and replacing it with bold, edgy branding that screams punk rock energy. People love brands that don't take themselves too seriously, and Liquid Death nails that by combining humor, environmental responsibility, and "stick-it-to-the-man" attitude. Social media platforms like TikTok, Instagram, and YouTube are where the action happens, and that's exactly where Liquid Death thrives. Limited-edition products, influencer collabs, and wild marketing stunts keep their brands hype alive. Plus, the brand's dedication to killing pollution by using recyclable aluminum cans is more than just talk. It's a movement that Liquid Death is hopping on. To keep the momentum going, this advertising strategy is all about embracing the absurd and meeting people where they actually hang out. One idea? "Thirst Murder Trials"—a viral challenge where people can submit their most creative ways to "murder their thirst" with a can of Liquid Death. Whether it's a slow-motion chug set to dramatic music or a staged "crime scene" where a plastic bottle gets what it deserves, the more ridiculous, the better. Another move? Partnering with comedians, tattoo artists, and underground musicians instead of just the usual extreme sports athletes. The weirder, the better.

Advertising that takes advantage of how fun games can be is another way to keep consumers engaged. Imagine an Instagram or Snapchat filter where users can "battle" evil plastic bottles in a virtual game or a TikTok filter that turns your drink into a can of Liquid Death with an ominous soundtrack. And for something more impactful in terms of the real world, unconventional and attention grabbing events like “Funeral for Plastic” could make waves with our target market. Something that literally stages a funeral for plastic bottles, complete with mourners, and eulogies, would not only be engaging, but a creative way for us to capture the attention of consumers. The viral potential is endless. The brand message of Liquid Death emphasizes a signature mix of both dark humor and brutal honesty. Expanding on “Murder Your Thirst” with slogans such as “Bury Boring Beverages” or “Water That Kills Boredom” keeps things fresh. When talking about sustainability, forget the usual “save the planet” messaging. Liquid Death should continue their advertising approach with lines like “Plastic Bottles Deserve Death”. Why sugarcoat it when you can make a statement that captures the ad viewer’s attention? And for content, exaggerating horror-like storytelling where plastic bottles are villains and Liquid Death is the hero turns a simple product into something dramatic but also a full-blown cinematic universe. At the end of the day, Liquid Death isn’t just selling water. It’s selling an attitude, a lifestyle, and a movement that feels like they’re a part of something bigger (and much cooler) than just staying hydrated. This campaign isn’t about blending in, it’s about standing out, making noise, and keeping the brand as wild and unpredictable as its regular customers. Because when it comes to marketing Liquid Death, playing it safe was never an option.